

Editorial cartoonist Stuart Carlson has the unique ability to look at current events and bring them from that far away place where news is made and into the homes and daily lives of his readers. His choice of material not only targets politicians and recognizable media figures, but it also covers topics that hold up a mirror to everyday Americans and sends them into action – wanting to take on the issues in their own lives.

Carlson follows political and social debates such as gun control, the presidential race, police brutality and health issues such as the tobacco industry, the health care system and the dangerously high usage of cellular phones in crowded theaters. He produces smart, top-quality work that is sure to get readers attention and focus it on what counts.

About the Creator:

As a youngster growing up in West Bend, Wis., Stuart Carlson exhibited a knack for cartooning at a tender age, sometimes drawing on the walls of his parents' apartment with lipstick.

Before joining the Milwaukee Sentinel in 1983, Carlson was a reporter, cartoonist and editor for a weekly newspaper and a small daily newspaper in Wisconsin. Carlson's ability to translate current events into cogent visual statements has won him several awards including first place in the 1995 Fischetti Editorial Cartoon Competition; the National Press Foundation's nation's best cartoonist of 1991; best cartoon of the year honors in 1983 and 1986 from the Milwaukee Press Club; the 1986 Robert W. Gillespie Sentinel Staff Award for Excellence; and the 1988 University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee's Young Alumni Award. His work has appeared in The New York Times, Newsweek, The Washington Post, Barron's, Playboy magazine and ABC News Nightline.

Carlson lives in a maintenance-intensive Victorian house in Milwaukee with his wife and three children.
