Why did God make people? Why do we die? What does God do every day?

Kids ask all the big questions. Many times parents, grandparents and the other adults in kids' lives feel stumped when asked to provide answers to questions that they, too, still find challenging.

KIDS TALK ABOUT GOD, a weekly column based on children's questions about God and spirituality, allows children and adults alike to stretch their minds. Written by seasoned religious reporter Carey Kingsolving, with contributions from children all over the country, the column avoids preachiness and denominational dogma. The kids' answers are loaded with humor, insight, innocence and honesty, making this a column that will entertain, encourage and inspire readers of all ages.

About the Creator:

Carey Kingsolving is a seasoned religion reporter. Many of his feature articles have appeared in The Washington Post and other major newspapers via news services such as The New York Times News Service, Cox, Hearst and Donrey. His subjects have ranged from profiles of well-known figures such as Elizabeth Dole, Tom Landry, Jimmy Carter and George Gallup Jr. to journey-of-faith stories of everyday Americans.

To gather initial material for Kids Talk About God, Kingsolving launched the Children's Bible Contest, which invited children to express their religious faith through their writing, drawing and other media. The contest offered a trip around the world as the grand prize. The "Mission Explorers Video Series," which Kingsolving produced and directed, features the winner of the contest in her global travels. The series has been a best seller for Nelson/Word Direct, a division of Thomas Nelson, one of the leading Christian publishing companies.

Kingsolving also conducts writing workshops for those who want to want to express their faith through the written word. He has completed workshops for students at Yale University, Harvard University, the University of North Carolina and others.

Kingsolving has master's degrees for the University of Missouri School of Journalism and Trinity Evangelical Divinity School. A native of McAllen, Texas, he currently lives in Memphis, Tenn.
